Expectation
Stress is a part of life. We stress about things we care about and value. Stress calls us to action. When we learn to expect stress, we can plan our time and make better decisions. Expecting stress allows us to have control over it, instead of stress controlling us (Rock, 2011).

Awareness
We all have a reaction to stress – avoiding, overindulging, etc. Awareness allows us to recognize when we need to take a step back so we can move forward (Cartwright, 2003).

Slowing Down
Once stressed, powering through sounds tempting. Powering through is not sustainable, however. Slowing down, even for just a minute, makes room to evaluate the situation so you can work smarter, not harder (Siegel, 2007).

Evaluation
Once you can think more clearly, you can better evaluate the situation. Get curious and creative about ways forward. Solutions exist; they just need to be found (Siegel, 2007).

A significant part of lowering stress is learning to manage your time better. If you feel like you can be successful, you will be less likely to be overwhelmed. Look at our Manage & Make Time section on the Learning Corner for more tools and strategies.

These are a few of many strategies available to you. For more ideas, check out our Less Stress section on the Learning Corner, or talk to an academic coach!

Put It into Practice.
Spend time reflecting on your values and goals. This will show you what stress motivates you towards a goal versus stress attached to unrealistic expectations or perfectionism.

At the end of a day, write down a time you experienced stress that day and what action you used to respond. Did that action move you closer to your goal?

Try Box Breathing: Inhale for four counts, hold for four counts, exhale for four counts, and let your lungs stay empty for four counts. This is just one of many different mindfulness exercises you may find helpful.

Try writing or talking the situation out with a friend or an academic coach. Often, we get stuck in our heads and are better able to process on paper or aloud.

It is completely normal to experience times where your stress can start to interfere with your life. CAPS is a resource that can help you understand your stress and personalize strategies to manage it.

Brought to you by The Learning Corner
@ the Academic Success Center success.oregonstate.edu/learning